restored to health again," was the 'nformation given out by a sad-faced woman at the Groff home in reply to a caller's query this morning. "He has been done a great injustice and now only wishes to be let alone. His plans for the future are as yet undecided."

Other than this statement no member of the Groff family would give voice to a single utterance against any of the trio of men who were convicted with Samuel Groff of defrauding the United States Government through the sales of the Groff patent mail-box fasteners. The window shades of the Groff home are all drawn, and the sick man is being faithfully and lovingly guarded from all intrusion. Save for the family physician, no outsider has been allowed to enter the sick room, and Groff maintains a strict silence as to the feeling he is said to entertain that his brother, Diller B. Groff, by declining to speak the words at the trial that would have indicated plainly his innocence, has done him the greatest injury of his career.
